Johnson eyes safe seat in exchange for truce with PM

Henry Zeffman
Associate Political Editor

Boris Johnson could agree not to challenge Rishi Sunak in exchange for the promise of a safe seat at the next election, friends of the former prime minister have said.

Johnson would seek to use "leverage" over Sunak if the Conservatives did badly in local elections in May under plans being discussed by allies. Four months after he left Downing Street, a determined group of Johnson supporters still hope that he will return to No 10 before the next general election.

One close ally of the prime minister said that the number of Conservative MPs who wanted Johnson to oust Sunak amounted to "only two dozen, maybe three dozen at most" and warned: "We would just look ridiculous if we changed PM again. Most people get that." Yet Johnson is unlikely to quit politics. "He would find it very hard to give up," the ally conceded.

Instead his friends are considering

Johnson will stand again in election, insists prime minister Rishi Sunak

Boris Johnson will stand in his current constituency at the next election despite claims he covets a safer seat, Rishi Sunak has said.

Friends of the former prime minister have discussed the idea that he could pledge loyalty to Sunak until the general election in exchange for the assurance

BORIS Johnson's Brexit plans blew up in his face last night as rebel Tory MPs helped to defeat the Government.
The humiliated PM was forced to call an election - which Labour will only back if no deal is reached out.
Defiant MPs voted to clear a path so they can block a no deal Brexit.
The 21 Tories who voted against the PM face expulsion from the party.

Boris Johnson Continues to Break Ministerial Code, as Constituents Complain of Absentee MP

Mr Johnson has voted in Parliament just once since being ousted in September. The last visit on his constituency website dates back to August when he visited embattled Hillingdon Hospital, which recently failed two Care Quality Commission inspections.

Residents in Boris Johnson's seat say they feel abandoned by their part-time MP, with the ousted Prime Minister appearing largely absent since leaving office.

And newly-selected Uxbridge and South Ruislip Labour candidate Danny Beales told Byline Times: “Whilst Boris Johnson jets around the world, earning millions, local residents are worried about putting on the heating, whether they can afford the weekly shop & if they’ll ever get their hospital appointment.
